Let us lay aside our prejudices and join the Chicken Liberation Army, which could be organized around the slogan "I'd Rather Be a Chicken." They might wear pith helmets and carry oversize sticks. With such a benevolent organization as the Chicken Liberation Army in charge, it could be simple to infiltrate the most alluring poulets in the world and convince them to leave their comfortable habitats and join us. So let us launch a sort of Chicken Surrender Program. We will feed our chickens to the liberated ones and give them a good home. For a start, we could begin by releasing the tiny coop-dwelling birds that populate the edges of the freezer at the supermarket. If we are successful in dealing a blow to the Chicken Industrial Complex, we can establish a Chicken Liberation Front, though one that's more respectable. After all, we have never gone to war with the Gentile nations, whereas they have resorted to bludgeons, sticks, and even nukes. Those asocial birds would be rude to say "You see," they might say, "we don't need a lot of talking to your kind. You have our bodies and we have your throats." Imagine the "You see" to come out of their beaks. The idea of it is so "you see" that it's hard to imagine. But once the idea is in one's head, it becomes real. The enemy will come, we will liberate them, and the Pig-Men will flee. The entire Chicken Liberation Front will be covered in ribbons with badges of chickens. We will be a nation of egg-eaters and would-be-poultry-eaters and we will live at peace with one another. ON EATING CHICKEN We eat chicken because it is nutritious. The first piece of meat to be tasted by man and man alone was chicken, the sweet meat of a fowl. It is one of the few foods not tainted by blood and is beneficial to the health. Chicken, in one form or another, was eaten by the first civilized people. The Egyptians in the Ithoron temples and at the temples of Denderah and Medinet-Habu were cooking chicken in the same manner as we do. They did not use spices, but the fragrance of the fowl filled the air with the smell of nectar. They were the first to cook this savory treat. The Egyptians, the Greeks, the Romans, and the others were so fascinated by the bird 82157476af
